- ENTJ - ENTJ Relationship

- Joys and Struggles

- This section ENTJ - ENTJ relationship is about how these two personality types come together in a relationship. Specifically, we will be looking at the joys of this relationship as well as the struggles this relationship may have.

- The ENTJ - ENTJ relationship has 4 preference similarities and 0 preference differences. Regardless of the number of similarities and differences, each personality combination will have its unique set of challenges. We will look at each of the 4 preferences individually:

- Extroversion-Extroversion

- Joys & Struggles

- Because both parties enjoy people, they are likely to go for many socializing activities and parties together. They will likely enjoy each other's energy and zest for life and have many fun activities and adventures together. Because of their love for people and socializing, they are likely to have a large network around them, supporting and mediating for the couple in time of need. Because both love to speak, (not so much listen), they may try to compete for air time when conversing with one another. So instead of listening, they may out talk each other in order to be heard. Hence, they may not feel fulfilled, especially if one party is always doing the talking and the other doing the listening. One party may turn to outside friends to fill that desire to speak and be heard, and in bad cases, it may lead to extra-marital affair.

- Intuition-Intuition

- Joys & Struggles

- Because both parties enjoy discussing big ideas, possibilities and global issues, they will usually find a certain attraction to each other. This is especially if they have similar viewpoints on certain issues, they will find chemistry with each other. Both tend to enjoy each other's uniqueness, not just in viewpoints but also in fashion, tastes and so on. Because both parties enjoy talking about the future, their conversations will more often revolve around future hopes and dreams and exciting possibilities. However, they may lack interest in everyday living, hence if they are a married couple, household duties may tend to be neglected. Even if they attempt to take care of household, they may still miss important details in its maintenance. The partner that has to be constantly responsible for the everyday maintenance may feel resentment or unfulfilled. A good balance can be achieved with proper delegation of duties or with the hiring of a domestic helper.

- Thinking-Thinking

- Joys & Struggles

- Both parties enjoy the straightforward and frank communication styles; no emotional issues are brought into discussion and decision making. As such, both find it easy to communicate with each other; they won't have to try to cushion their message or filter it; but can afford to be direct without being afraid of offending the other party. In decision-making, both parties use a logical, objective analysis to assess pros and cons. This same mode of decision-making will mean that they are less likely to come into conflict. While both are logical with one another, sometimes some romance and affection can liven up the relationship; both parties may have issues showing it. Because both use a logical and objective process in decision-making, they may have a blind spot in considering their personal values. Under stress, they may have an issue controlling their own emotions; sometimes this can lead to highly intense fights that are destructive.

- Judging-Judging

- Joys & Struggles

- Because both value organization, they are likely to have a neat and tidy household with clear rules and standards, something which both parties will prefer. They are likely also to plan their schedules with each other, with little or no issue with unnecessary last minute changes. They will also appreciate their partner's ability to keep up with the demands of everyday living and stay on top. They will likely be strong together with budgeting, there will be little or no issues with planning out finances together. Even though both parties may have standards in the household, they may have very different standards. Because both tend to be opinionated, their arguments and quarrels may be more intense. Both may refuse to budge on their standards and compromise. Both parties like to settle things; this means that sometimes they may make premature decisions without sufficiently considering their alternative options.

- Here's how ENTJs can relate to each other better:

- Reaching out to the ENTJ as an ENTJ

- Watch out for everyone else – There's a Chinese saying that goes, "One mountain cannot contain two tigers." Your forceful personalities often clash. Not that it's a problem but do watch out for others around you. Take different realms of command – To prevent clashes, the best way might just be to put yourselves in different areas. That way there won't be clash of opinions too often. Give ways for both ideas to exist – The best way is to find a 3rd solution that incorporates elements of both ideas. That way, both parties don't feel slighted or dismissed. Don't take the intense debates personally – Sometimes you may take the challenging nature of your partner personally. Remember, it's nothing personal, it's usually all business! Give independence – Don't impose your ideas on your partner. Give him/her independence to figure out how best to manage his/her affairs.
- This is a summary of the joys and pains of the ENTJ – ENTJ relationship.
- However, personality dynamics are more complex than this. It does not just extend to the difference or similarity in individual preferences but goes deeper than that.
